

EDITOR'S NOTE

This issue is a testament to the history of political thought tradition that informs The Political Science Reviewer. With articles exploring thinkers from Plato and Aristotle to Shakespeare and Machiavelli, and with topics ranging from civil religion and monarchy to citizenship and bronze age pervert(s), the issue has much to offer readers of political theory. Some of these articles have been in the works for nearly a couple years, other for just a few short months. The authors, to a person, have been a delight to work and, as always, we are grateful they have chosen The Political Science Reviewer to share their work with the literate public.

A special thanks is owed to Nicholas Tampio for spearheading the excellent Author-Meets-Critics symposium on Jeffrey Church's Kant, Liberalism, and the Meaning of Life. The book is very good; the symposium edifying.

The next issue features a symposium called "Traditions in Latin American Political Thought and Constitutionalism." Almost all the papers were presented at the recent SPSA conference in New Orleans, LA. There will be papers from Bentham in Colombia to Tocqueville in Mexico. The authors are all working hard preparing their research for a summer release of the issue.

Finally, this coming summer, The Political Science Reviewer will be moving its home base from the Political Science Department at the University of Wisconsin-Madison to the School of Civic Thought and Economic Thought and Leadership (SCETL) at Arizona State University. While there will likely be some technical glitches in the transition, we encourage authors to continue submitting both research and ideas for future symposia.
